

Ian Bette

1/22/17

While doing some research, I found that the Agile Development is very similar to the waterfall method that is explained in our book. They both consist of many different steps contributed by different people/roles to achieve a goal in software development. However, the waterfall method is a little more cleaner and makes more sense because it works as when you complete the first task, you move to the next part of the waterfall. As for the Agile Development method works more as many people working on different steps to reach their goal.